A Salted Undershirt for the Grip,

Five years ago I was suffering with a very severe throat trouble, so much so I did not expect to live. An acquaintance told me that he could give me a remedy that would cure it and, as I had tried all of the doctors in my town without receiving any benefit, I decided to try the remedy suggested. I tried it, was permanently cured of my cough, and besides I discovered that I was not subject to colds.

Tonight we rode beneath a moon That made the mooriand pale; And our horses' feet kept well the tune, And our pulses did not fail.

The moon shope clear: the hear frost fell The world slept, as it seemed; Sleep held the night, but we rode well, And as we rode we dreamed.

We dreamed of ghostly horse and hound, The flight at dead of night: The more the fearful thoughts we found,

And when we heard the white owl fly And hoot with mouraful tone, We thought to see dead men go by, And pressed our horses on.

The more was our delight.

The merrier then our riding song Upon the homeward road. h, whether the way be short or long Is all in the rider's mood!

And still our pulses kept the tale, Our gallop kept the tune, As round and over hill and vale We rode beneath the moon. —Ernest Rhys in Youth's Companion.

New York is a great city. During the run of a pantomime I sat one matines down in front. One of the most conspicuous characters in the piece, which was "Cinderella," was a little chap about as large as a five-year-old baby, dressed in Hungarian uniform and acting as page to the prince of the fairy tale. And very clever he was too. That same evening I saw something in the two little boys who bring my family laundry to remind me of the small page and the prince's footman.
